Stainless Steel Type

When looking at flatware, the stainless steel type being used is essential to understanding the quality of the flatware you are receiving. The two numbers that make up the stainless steel type are indicating first the chromium content, and second the nickel content. The 18% chromium content in all Acopa flatware ensures durability and corrosion resistance for long lasting use.

Acopa flatware lines boasting 18/8 stainless steel have the added advantage of 8% nickel content. This produces a higher quality construction as well as a better luster than their 18/0 counterparts. This luster has a bright, polished look that effortlessly brightens your tabletop display for a more refined look.

Added Advantages

These Acopa flatware lines are extra heavy weight, making them ideal for high-end restaurants. The extra heavy weight of the flatware allows your guests to feel the quality and durability of the flatware, promoting a professional feel. It also makes this flatware ideal for serving heavy foods, such as steaks, stews, or seafood.

Despite their professional feel and quality construction, this flatware is still dishwasher safe to promote an efficient cleaning process for your staff.
